The new online application portal, called Jira, will transform the way applications to the Administration of Radioactive Substances Advisory Committee (ARSAC) are submitted.

Uploading applications to the Jira online portal will offer a quick and simple way to apply for approval of new practitioner licences, track the status of approvals and share with colleagues.

Nasreen Parkar, Scientific Adviser to ARSAC, said:

Moving to the new system will mean all new practitioner licence applications will need to be made through the Jira online portal from September 2021. The application system is straightforward and will allow applicants to submit and track the progress of their application. We are currently using this system for research approvals and so far it has been working really well.
