The UK should refuse to discuss a security deal until the ransom demand is dropped

It is axiomatic that the EU will agree a comprehensive partnership with the UK on security and serious crime, because the UK’s security assets are far better than those of the EU states, said UKIP. The UK will continue to work closely with its partners inside and outside the EU to defeat terrorism and cross-border crime.

UKIP response to Parson's Green terror attack

UKIP home affairs spokeswoman Jane Collins MEP has said, "the time has come to ramp up our responses to dealing with extremism of all kinds."

"We need more investment in our counter terrorism services just like we need more bobbies on the beat. We need root and branch reform of statutory institutions where extremism is taking hold and the police need to concentrate on real threats not on people having twitter arguments.

"One way we can deal with extremists is by ridding this country of hate preachers and the kinds of institutions where extremist beliefs are taught. This is where the government is so wrong to committ to remaining in the ECHR and under the jurisdiction of Europe. We must have the power to kick out hate preachers just as we must have the power to deal with homegrown terrorists."
