

Mental Health Strategy a 'missed opportunity'

- Home
- All News
- Mental Health Strategy a 'missed opportunity'

30 Mar 2017

The Scottish Conservatives have described the Scottish Government's new Mental Health Strategy as a 'missed opportunity' after the details of it were announced in Holyrood today.

In his response, Scottish Conservative mental health spokesman Miles Briggs called for far greater investment in services than what the SNP is proposing.

Scottish Conservative mental health spokesman Miles Briggs MSP said:

"Like many of the organisations involved in delivering mental health services and supporting those with mental health problems, I do not believe this strategy will make the transformative change we all want to see.

"This mental health strategy simply doesn't live up to the promises the First Minister has made on rights, resources and reforms.

"It is clear that the mental health sector is not satisfied with the strategy and increasingly feel they have not been listened to and included.

"If the Mental Health Strategy is going to signpost the development of better mental well-being in Scotland for the next decade, then we need to see a far greater investment in services and vision than what the SNP is proposing.

"We also need guarantees that the Scottish Government will be able to deliver it, especially as no report card was ever produced for the last strategy.

"The Mental Health Strategy is a missed opportunity and is simply not good enough to deliver a new approach to mental health in Scotland. SNP Ministers need to think again."

Eurosceptic MPs must resist the temptation to meddle with the Great Repeal Bill

No sooner was Article 50 triggered than David Davis's "Department X" sprang into action. The Secretary of State has today launched the white paper for the Great Repeal Bill.

The Bill gets its name from its immediate, crucial effect: the repeal of the European Communities Act 1972. This is the prerequisite to restoring full Parliamentary sovereignty over our laws, but it isn't the only thing that needs to happen to ensure a "smooth and orderly exit".

It's for that reason that, despite its name, the Bill's second effect will be to vastly extend the UK statute book, effectively copying and pasting all current EU law into UK law. This means inserting thousands of regulations and directives into British statute, a reminder of the degree to which Brussels exerted its powers during our membership.

Doing so has two benefits – first, it ensures that on the day after Brexit there is no immediate disruption by a sudden reversion either to pre-1972 laws or to a vacuum in areas where Westminster hadn't the power to legislate while we were in the EU. And second, it ensures that any deviation from or scrapping of EU laws that takes place as part of Brexit will require Parliament's approval – a right and proper restoration of democratic control.

This approach brings with it two complications, one objection and one temptation.

The first complication relates to the role of the European Court of Justice. ECJ case law – the thousands of judgments on how EU law should be interpreted – is an important extra element of the way in which EU law operates in this country. To copy across the legislation and regulations but not to incorporate the case law would blunt the effect of the Bill, meaning that Brexit would still see sudden adjustments in the law overnight.

Davis's solution is for the Bill to "provide that any question as to the meaning of EU law that has been converted into UK law will be determined in the UK courts by reference to the CJEU's case law as it exists on the day we leave the EU." This means that May will remain true to her promise to end the authority of the ECJ over our law post-Brexit – no new rulings in Luxembourg will have any power. Parliament will be able to overrule and alter those past judgments, as will the Supreme Court. In effect, a current snapshot of EU law, including its case law, will be transposed, to be edited at will by sovereign British institutions whenever they might wish to do so.

The second complication is that a perfect, word-for-word, copy of EU law won't quite do the job once we leave the EU. For obvious reasons, it routinely refers to the powers of EU institutions, to the EU treaties and to all manner of other organisations and legal structures that we will have left once we leave the EU.

To take a random example, the legislation which defines the framework for agricultural regulation is needed for all the other, product-specific, agricultural regulations to function and make sense; Parliament would want to retain that, at least in the short term, to ensure a smooth Brexit. But in its current form it empowers the EU Commission to change the definitions of products and alter how tariffs apply to them; Parliament obviously wouldn't want to give the Commission that power after we have left the EU.

This means that there are many small amendments that need to be made during the copying across process in order to make these laws work in a solely British context – mostly changing references from EU institutions to UK institutions, and altering references to the treaties to become references to other parts of the Great Repeal Bill.

This could all just be done in the drafting of the Great Repeal Bill. But that would take time up-front, and would risk bogging the important principles of the Bill down in niggling. Davis's answer is for the Bill to provide for a power to make these alterations through secondary legislation after the Bill has become an Act.

It is this power that gives rise to the objection. Such powers, known rather arcanelly as "Henry VIII" powers, inevitably reduce Parliamentary scrutiny over the changes that are being made. The Government argues that the timing is too tight to have full debates and votes on every one of what could be thousands of what are really technical edits. Furthermore, the White Paper points out that some of the detail won't be agreed until when (or if) a Brexit deal is struck – and waiting on the whole process until then is impractical given the need to ensure an orderly Brexit. Critics fear that ministers will use their new power to change the nature, rather than just the technical wording, of the law – ditching particular regulations outright, for example. The words "Tory power grab" are sure to issue forth from one Labour, Lib Dem or SNP MP before long.

The White Paper includes a promise that this won't happen: "The Great Repeal Bill will not aim to make major changes to policy or establish new legal frameworks in the UK beyond those which are necessary to ensure the law continues to function properly from day one." Opposition MPs might not find that sufficiently reassuring, but there is another aspect which allays their concerns rather more strongly. Because EU law is also in effect in the devolved nations, the Great Repeal Bill will also give the same power to ministers in the devolved administrations. Even if May and Davis harboured a secret desire to implement sweeping policy changes without Parliamentary approval, they would be very unlikely to grant Labour in Cardiff and the SNP in Holyrood the opportunity to do the same. Devolution acts as a disincentive for the UK government to over-reach itself.

This leaves us with the temptation presented by the Great Repeal Bill. The power of the moment – the return, at last, of full democratic control over our laws – and the name of the Bill itself whets Eurosceptic appetites to start instantly tearing up the EU laws that they have railed against for so long. Why not start tabling amendments to the Bill now, to delete bad regulations and torch red tape instantly, without having to wait to undo it after March 2019?

There is plenty of demand for a bonfire of EU red tape. This site called in November for the Chancellor to establish a task force to advise on a new and better post-Brexit regulatory regime. The Daily Telegraph followed our call this week and has launched a campaign on the topic.

But it would be a serious error to go jumping in with attempts to deregulate instantly by meddling with the Great Repeal Bill. There is a good reason why we and the Telegraph have both suggested that the Government should prepare for action after Brexit, rather than start cutting out particular EU laws in the Brexit process. Those who wish to hobble Brexit, or even prevent it entirely, are studying the Bill with a wolfish eye. They can see that it is complex, and that it must run on a tight timescale. They know that complexity equals opportunities to raise concerns, mount attacks and perhaps inspire rebellions. They view it as a major opportunity for their promised “fightback”.

If Eurosceptic MPs were to start trying to mess with the Bill, they would be giving Farron, Heseltine et al exactly what they want. They might even find themselves in the same lobby as those who loathe everything they believe in.

Last year’s referendum victory was the product of a sustained exercise in self-denial. When Eurosceptics indulged our temptations, talking high theory and dragging out historical analogy, we lost. When we exercised self-denial, studying to learn what would win and working to focus on the issues that interested less obsessive voters, we won. This trial is just the same: do what makes you feel good, and risk losing the great prize; knuckle down and do what must be done, and finally secure what you have always wanted.

Independence “the last thing the Scottish property market needs”

- Home
- All News
- Independence “the last thing the Scottish property market needs”

30 Mar 2017

The SNP’s threat of a second independence referendum is having a negative effect on the Scottish housing market, experts have warned.

Estate agency McEwan Fraser Legal revealed that as a result of Nicola Sturgeon's independence obsession, interest from foreign buyers had "virtually dried up."

The estate agency admitted that there has been a dramatic increase in the number of foreign investors deciding to no longer invest in properties across Scotland.

Ken McEwan, the estate agency's chief executive, voiced the Scottish housing markets concerns, stating that a referendum is "the last thing the Scottish property market needs."

McEwan added: "Property investors are quite rightly nervous, as many view a future independent Scotland as bad for the property market.

"With uncertainty about the Scottish currency, job and investment, these main factors will all have a detrimental effect on the Scottish housing market."

The Scottish Conservatives are now demanding that the SNP stops brushing aside the worries from Scottish businesses.

Scottish Conservative shadow finance secretary Murdo Fraser said:

"The housing industry can now be added to the growing list of sectors negatively hit by the SNP's selfish push for independence.

"The threat of a UK separation is quite clearly hindering foreign investment, and the ongoing uncertainty caused by Nicola Sturgeon is resulting in an unstable future for the property industry.

"For the SNP to be content with causing so many issues for our economy as a result of its obsession with independence shows an irresponsible tunnel vision and staggering arrogance."

Ken McEwan quotes in The Times:

<http://www.thetimes.co.uk/article/foreign-buyers-back-off-as-independence-push-hits-the-housing-market-rklpk9pzz>

Damning report highlights awful treatment of sexual assault victims

- Home

- All News
- Damning report highlights awful treatment of sexual assault victims

30 Mar 2017

A report from HMICS has given a damning assessment of the treatment of victims of sexual assault in Scotland.

The review looked into how victims of sexual crime receive medical attention while forensic evidence is also gathered for possible prosecution.

It found that the services offered in Scotland lagged way behind those in the rest of the UK, and highlighted an urgent need to find appropriate healthcare facilities for forensic medical examinations.

It also mentioned examples of some victims being asked not to wash for a day or more after an assault.

The Scottish Conservatives have said the report must act as a 'wake-up call' for the Scottish Government, and asked them to outline how they plan to improve services in the immediate future.

Scottish Conservative shadow justice secretary Douglas Ross MSP said:

"This is a damning report that gives us further insight into the appalling treatment received by victims of sexual assault.

"These individuals have already been through a traumatic experience, so for them to be treated in this manner is simply inexcusable.

"Examples highlighted in the report of victims being asked not to wash for over a day after an assault is cruel in the extreme, and the SNP need to use this as a wake-up call.

"When the facilities in Scotland are described as unacceptable and far worse than those in the rest of the UK, there is no excuse for the catalogue of failings in this report.

"If we don't see improvements soon we risk seeing further examples of victims being let down when they need support the most and possibly deterred from reporting their assault."

You can read the report here:

<http://www.hmics.org/publications/hmics-strategic-overview-provision-forensic-medical-services-victims-sexual-crime>

Richard Burgon responds to the latest legal aid statistics

Richard Burgon MP, Labour's Shadow Justice Secretary, responding to the latest legal aid statistics, said:

"Under the Conservatives, legal advice and representation is becoming a privilege for the wealthy few.

"Many ordinary people dealing with difficult issues are no longer able to receive the legal assistance they need and deserve.

"This Tory Government must stop dragging their feet and get on with the long-awaited review of their disastrous cuts to legal aid.

"Labour is supporting the Bach Commission in working to design a 21st century justice system which protects rather than penalises those who need advice, representation and justice."