

News story: Defence Secretary honours allies Australian and New Zealand on Anzac Day

Veterans from both countries gathered to mark Anzac Day, which honours the anniversary of the first major military action fought by Australian and New Zealand forces during the First World War.

ANZAC stands for Australian and New Zealand Army Corps. The soldiers in those forces quickly became known as Anzacs, taking pride in the name.

After laying a wreath at the Cenotaph the Defence Secretary attended a service of commemoration and thanksgiving alongside military personnel at Westminster Abbey.

Defence Secretary Gavin Williamson at Anzac Day memorial

Defence Secretary Gavin Williamson said:

On Anzac Day, we remember the sacrifice and courage of troops from Australia and New Zealand. Almost a century has passed since the end of the First World War and Britain is proud to have served side-by-side with them in many conflicts over the last 100 years. Our alliance is one of the most constant and enduring military partnerships in history, one which will continue to protect our shared values and commit to make the world a safer, more secure place.

Gavin Williamson has met with his counterparts from Australia and New Zealand earlier this year to examine how allies can continue to work together against evolving threats.

Currently the UK partners with both Australia and New Zealand in a number of ways, including the UN peacekeeping mission to South Sudan, uniting in the Global Coalition to defeat Daesh, committing to establish stability in Syria and Afghanistan, and combining on humanitarian missions such as Ebola in Sierra Leone.

To provide security to the seas, the UK works side-by-side with Australia and New Zealand as part of the Combined Maritime Force, to tackle drug and weapon smugglers. Additionally, as part of our strengthening relationship the Royal Navy ship HMS Sutherland visited Australia in February and March, allowing further opportunities for our naval forces to collaborate.

Alongside the Foreign Secretary, Gavin Williamson laid a wreath to mark the wartime service of Britain's closest allies Australia and New Zealand.

Our shared values with Australia and New Zealand have facilitated more than one hundred people from all three services enrolling on exchanges programmes between countries, to encourage joint learning. Alongside this participation we continue to work together on science, technology and defence equipment.

Government promises increase in per pupil funding

In today's debate on money for schools the Secretary of State promised minimum per pupil amounts for every school under his new formula. I pointed out that this year some schools in Wokingham are still below the minimum thresholds he is proposing, and urged him to speed up the adjustment of cash for them.

Treasury minister John Glen outlines the package of measures...

Treasury minister John Glen outlines the package of measures Conservatives in government are taking to tackle unlawful lending and increase the amount of money seized from loan sharks to support vulnerable victims.

Secretary of State for Housing, Sajid Javid, writes for today's...

I want to build more beautiful houses

Affordable housing does not have to be poorly made – and it must take local communities into account

SAJID JAVID

Whether they're buying or renting, living in the private sector or in social housing, everyone cares about what their home and local neighbourhood look like and how they make us feel. Looks matter. As Winston Churchill once said: "We shape our buildings; thereafter they shape us."

Design quality is not just something that is nice to have if you can afford it and know your Le Corbusier. From your Zanesville Howard it is fundamental to everyone's quality of life. So when it comes to delivering the homes our country desperately needs, I don't believe there should be a trade-off between quantity, quality and affordability. That's why we are holding a design conference today that will bring together more than 400 experts from across the industry to ensure that, when we build more homes, we also build better homes. From the elegant squares and crescents of the Georgian period to modern town houses, via Victorian terraces and the garden suburbs of the 20th century, Britain is a world leader in housing and design. Now we have to consider how we can leave the current generation with a strong legacy and an inspiring vision of what we want our villages, towns and cities to look and feel like in years to come. Today's new build is, potentially, tomorrow's period property.

With that in mind, it is even more important that the industry has a chance to showcase great examples of well-designed development, not just focusing on trying to meet short-term housing targets but aiming to become a much-loved part of the fabric of local areas. These include Beauty In My Backyard, from the Prince's Foundation – or Nirby. A more positive variation on Nirby, it really sums up what we all want from new homes, which is ultimately somewhere we are proud to live in and next door to. This is essentially what good design comes down to.

With fresh generations of first-time buyers expecting the highest-quality homes before parting with their hard-earned deposits, and developers wanting to win over communities ahead of building the homes our country needs, better quality design has never been so important.

This is about much more than just considering whether high-rise blocks are "cites in the sky". It's about whether development is in keeping with, and supported by, local communities, and ensuring that it has real character. No one wants to live in or live next door to brick boxes that could be anywhere, and there is no reason why they should have to.

Britain has always been a trailblazer for world class design. And now there is new technology that could help us build more homes faster, while also keeping quality high and offering people choice, including through modern methods of construction such as modular homes.

As we consider what our legacy to the 21st century should be, we have to take into account the wants and needs not just of the next generation but future generations. Is it a legacy that allows our children and grandchildren to enjoy the same opportunities to prosper and put down roots as we did?

Are we being as bold and ambitious as we should be in meeting the challenges of our age?

The Government is playing its part. Last month, the Prime Minister and I announced planning reforms that strengthened the expectations for design quality and community engagement. This means that any plans for new housing developments need to give much more consideration to the character of the local area, so that what is being proposed complements what is already there and meets the needs and expectations of that community.

And the Government is backing this with £5 billion in funding to ensure that, ahead of building the homes, the existing community and potential new residents know roads, schools and other facilities will also be built.

We want to build on this work and encourage stronger collaboration across the industry, so that high-quality design is the norm, rather than the exception. But we recognise that this is an issue that is bigger than government and the housing sector. It is about how, in shaping the places where we live, we shape lives.

Sajid Javid is Secretary of State for Housing

FOLLOW Sajid Javid on Twitter @sajidjavid. READ MORE at t.co/9rjph.co.uk or t.co/9rjph

Secretary of State for Housing, Sajid Javid, writes for today's Daily

Telegraph: “Affordable housing does not have to be poorly made – and it must take local communities into account”

Why we need to ban upskirting

Upskirting is the act of taking a photo up a woman’s skirt without her consent.

In 2009 it was made illegal in Scotland but shockingly it remains legal in England and Wales.

Authorities can ask a perpetrator to delete the photo but under current law no further prosecution is possible.

Go to Source

Author: