

EU rights and data protection bodies: new technology and data protection have to go hand in hand

"There's no doubt that technology can play a vital role in our lives – be it in the transition to the 'new normal' or when used to safeguard public health," said FRA's Director, Michael O'Flaherty. "But it has to be used correctly, respecting people's fundamental rights and data protection principles. Our renewed cooperation with the EDPS shall help us highlight these important issues and promote rights-respecting practices in Europe."

"The outbreak of Covid-19 is affecting our lives at an unprecedented pace. It is testing the resilience of our societies as we respond to this global crisis and try to contain its consequences, both in the short and in the long run," added Wojciech Wiewiórowski, the European Data Protection Supervisor. "Data protection is clearly not a problem, but part of the solution."

Since the outbreak of COVID-19, both FRA and EDPS have been highlighting the importance of transparent, secure and voluntary use of technology to help curb the spread of the virus.

FRA's Bulletin on fundamental rights implications of COVID-19 called for clear conditions for the roll-out of coronavirus contact-tracing apps, such as clear basis in law, voluntary use and no use of data for other purposes than those for which they were collected.

The EDPS is responsible in the EU for ensuring that the fundamental right to data protection is respected. To this end, it advises EU institutions and collaborates with other EU bodies, including FRA. In the past weeks, contact tracing apps and data localisation have become a constant topic in the political agenda of the Union. Such technologies may have strong consequences on EU citizens' lives and lead to growing inequalities.

In many countries, data protection authorities have been heavily involved in the design and development of contact-tracing apps, ensuring that the technology is rights-compliant.

This is ever more important as new FRA data reveal that many Europeans are unwilling to share data about themselves with public and private bodies. Some 41% do not want to share any personal data with private companies and 55% fear criminals or fraudsters accessing their personal data.

FRA and EDPS will continue working together in the future to put data protection issues in the spotlight.

With the entering into force of the General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR) in 2018, FRA, the EDPS and the Council of Europe issued together a Handbook on European data protection law. It presents and explains European data protection law in a straightforward way for those working in this area.

- CZK 8 billion (around €300 million) loan to finance flood prevention, storm water retention, water supply and sanitation measures across the country.

- Around 110 000 people to benefit from better water services.
- Sixth EIB operation bringing EIB lending to the Czech Ministry of Agriculture to €1.3 billion, with a strong climate action focus.

The European Investment Bank (EIB) is lending CZK 8 billion (around €300 million) to finance a vast set of measures put in place by the Czech Ministry of Agriculture to strengthen the country's water management services, including flood protection and storm management.

The implementation of the project will result in significant benefits for the people of the Czech Republic. It will provide protection against floods to an additional 47 000 people and improve the water supply of a total population of 24 000. Furthermore, it will increase wastewater collection and treatment for a total of 39 000 people and create an additional 2 million m³ of storm water storage capacity.

EIB Vice-President Lilyana Pavlova commented: "The EU climate bank is taking action to preserve natural resources and protect the environment for future generations. Thanks to these measures, the EU bank will help to improve living conditions for some 110 000 people in the Czech Republic, where approximately 25% of the population live in flood-prone zones facing disastrous floods on average every 10-15 years. This is a programme with a strong climate action focus, which will allow for the provision of better water services and help the country to meet its commitments stemming from national and EU environmental legislation."

Czech Minister of Agriculture Miroslav Toman stated: "The Ministry of Agriculture greatly appreciates the long-term cooperation with the EIB and we are very pleased to continue with it. We are facing a turbulent period of climate change, which we perceive – from the point of view of the Czech Republic – above all as a considerable decrease in water resources. As part of the measures under construction, our priority is to ensure a stable supply of drinking water for the citizens of the Czech Republic and to build new and repair existing ponds in municipalities. However, we must not forget the opposite extreme and protect the population from floods. EIB funding will help us implement many important measures to combat climate change in the coming years."

The current operation is a continuation of very fruitful cooperation between the EIB and the Czech Ministry of Agriculture. It is the sixth loan provided by the EU bank to this ministry since 1999, for a total amount of €1.3 billion.

Examples of concrete projects supported by the loan:

Water supply and sewerage

Project: Jelence Waterworks

The investment involves the construction of a 1.6 km-long water line, one well drill and a reservoir of 40 m³ with water treatment technology. Upon completion, a high quality drinking water supply will be provided to local residents.

Flood prevention

Project: Třebovice, Třebovka – Česká Třebová, flow modification – construction part

The aim of the investment is to provide flood protection along the section of the Třebovka watercourse over 12 km for the municipalities of Třebovice and Rybník and the city of Česká Třebová. This operation will increase the level of flood protection from the current two-year floods to 100-year floods.

Project: Construction of a municipal pond in Chotěšice (Central Bohemia)

Construction of a 4.7 ha water reservoir with a total volume of 66 000 m³. The project will improve the local water regime, stabilise the level of local groundwater and strengthen local eco-stabilisation functions. The water reservoir will also have flood protection impacts with a retention volume of 24 000 m³.

In countries of the European Union and of Latin America, SMEs account for 99 % of all businesses. They are a key element of both economies. However, the 2019 Intellectual Property SME Scoreboard, confirms that one of the main barriers to SMEs registering IPR is the lack of knowledge of what IP is and how it can benefit their business is.

Therefore, IP Key LA has designed a series of country-focused webinars directed at EU SMEs. It aims to disseminate information about IP, its importance and benefits to SMEs, in order to motivate them to take advantage of what IP can do for their businesses.
