

Government clarifies that Prohibition on Face Covering Regulation is not in conflict with public health appeal

On news report that the Prohibition on Face Covering Regulation will affect preventive measures during flu seasons and have an impact on public health, a spokesman for the Government made the following clarifications today (October 5):

"The new Regulation is not in conflict with public health appeal. The Regulation will not prohibit the public from wearing masks for health reasons to prevent the infection and transmission of diseases. Wearing masks is one of the measures to prevent respiratory infection. To prevent communicable diseases such as seasonal flu, the Government has suggested a list of preventive measures, including receiving relevant vaccines, and maintaining good personal and environmental hygiene."
