LONDON: Nationwide protests in Iran following the death of a woman in custody could topple the country's so-called morality police, Human Rights Watch has said.

Rothna Begum, senior researcher at HRW's women's rights division, told The Independent that the morality police "could have their powers removed" after 22-year-old Mahsa Amini died in September after being detained for an alleged infringement of Iran's hijab rules.

LONDON: The UN has warned that people living near oil fields, where gas is openly burned, face heightened risks of leukaemia, and that it has classified such areas as “modern sacrifice zones.”

Singling out sites in Iraq for gas flaring – a process of burning gas released by oil drilling that produces cancer-linked pollutants including CO<sub>2</sub>, methane and black soot – the UN said profits have been prioritized over human rights, noting Britain’s BP and Italy’s Eni as working these sites.
