

DCMS should stand up to the Treasury and publicly assure us the FOBTs review has not been shelved – Tom Watson

Tom Watson MP, Labour's Shadow Secretary of State for Digital, Culture, Media and Sport, commenting on reports that the Chancellor has scrapped the Fixed-odds betting terminals (FOBTs) review, said:

"This is an astonishing intervention by Philip Hammond.

"If the Treasury has insisted the review is shelved then the Chancellor has ridden roughshod over his Cabinet colleagues and overwhelming public evidence about the danger these highly addictive machines pose.

"British gamblers lost £1.8 billion on fixed-odds betting terminals last year alone, money that could make a better contribution to the economy if spent elsewhere.

"If Philip Hammond was so concerned about his bottom line, maybe he shouldn't have approved a £1 billion sweetheart deal with the DUP.

"The Department for Culture, Media and Sport should stand up to the Treasury and publicly assure us the review has not been shelved."

"It is a relief to know that a safe and appropriate place looks to have been found for Young Person X.

"This case must act as a wake-up call for the Government, who must now invest properly in Child and Adolescent Mental Health Services so that we never find ourselves in this position again."

Labour calls for urgent action to deal with shortcomings in mental health provision following the judgment of Sir James Munby

Barbara Keeley

MP, Labour's Shadow Minister for Mental Health, has today written to Jeremy Hunt, following the judgment of Sir James Munby in the case of the young person referred to as X, calling on the Health Secretary to take personal action today to ensure the allocation of a supportive and safe placement for the young person X.

In the letter, Keeley urges Hunt to take heed of the 'scathing words in this judgment' and take immediate action to deal with the shortcomings in our Child and Adolescent Mental Health Services. To achieve this, Keeley calls on the Government to announce extra funding for those services and commit to ring-fencing funding both for CAMHS and mental health services more generally.

Dear
Jeremy,

I am writing to you following the judgment of Sir James Munby in the Family Division of the High Court on 3rd August in the case of the young person referred to as X. The scathing words in this judgment stand as a warning of the need for urgent action to improve the care available for children and young people in a mental health crisis.

The judge said:

“What this case demonstrates .. is the disgraceful and utterly shaming lack of proper provision in this country of the clinical, residential and other support services so desperately needed by the increasing numbers of children and young people afflicted with the same kind of difficulties as X is burdened with..

“If this is the best we can do for X, and others in similar crisis, what right do we, what right do the system, our society and indeed the State itself, have to call ourselves civilised? The honest answer to this question should make us all feel ashamed...

“If, when in eleven days’ time she is released from ZX, we, the system, society, the State, are unable to provide X with the supportive and safe placement she so desperately needs, and if, in consequence, she is enabled to make another attempt on her life, then I can only say, with bleak emphasis: we will have blood on our hands.”

On Monday of this week you defended your Government’s performance on mental health services by saying “Look at our record”. The judgment in the case of X allows us to make that examination and it finds current services seriously wanting.

There have been many reports warning of the current weaknesses of Child and Adolescent Mental Health Services. In a report in May 2016, the Children’s Commissioner reported that: “of particular concern were some of the 3,000 children and young people we heard about who were referred to CAMHS with a life-threatening condition (such as suicide, self-harm, psychosis and anorexia nervosa), of whom: – 14% were not allocated any provision; – 51% went on a waiting list; – some waited over 112 days to receive services.”

In

October 2016, you said that CAMHS: “is possibly the biggest single area of weakness in NHS provision at the moment” and that there were “too many tragedies”.

Sir James

Munby has expressed his fears about the worst potential outcome in this case. We must also be aware of other similar and pressing cases.

I urge you to take personal action today to ensure the allocation of a supportive and safe placement for the young person X. I further urge you to make plans to deal with the shortcomings so clearly identified in our CAMHS services and to announce both extra funding for those services and plans to ring-fence funding both for CAMHS and for mental health services more generally.

As Sir

James Munby has said, if the current state of Child and Adolescent Mental Health Services is the best we can do, what right does the State have to call itself civilised?

Given the level of public interest in this case, I will be making this letter public.

Yours

sincerely,

Barbara
Keeley MP

The Government is sending out mixed messages on who will be allowed to fish in UK waters post-Brexit – Lynch

Holly Lynch MP, Labour’s Shadow Minister for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, responding to Michael Gove’s comments on post-Brexit fishing access to UK waters, said:

“The Government is sending out mixed messages on who will be allowed to fish in UK waters post-Brexit.

"Michael Gove, after previously taking a tough line on exclusive rights for U.K. vessels, is already watering down those commitments.

"The Government must clarify its position urgently to prevent further damage to EU diplomatic relations that could potentially harm a deal for the British fishing industry."

Barbara Keeley comment on Sir James Munby's judgment

Barbara Keeley MP, Labour's Shadow Mental Health Minister, commenting on Sir James Munby's judgment, said:

"The Tory Government have been warned time and again that Child and Adolescent Mental Health Services are at crisis point. It is simply unacceptable that services have got to a level where it is now a matter of life and death, as in this case.

"Government ministers must act now to safeguard this young person."
