Smith MP, Labour's Shadow Minister for Voter Engagement and Youth Affairs, responding to Phillip Hammond's comments at a meeting with the 1922 Committee, said:

"The

Tories have failed young people on education, housing and living standards so it's no surprise they were rejected so overwhelmingly at the election.

"If

Philip Hammond is looking for ideas to help young people, he could consult Labour's manifesto "For the Many not the Few" for policies to scrap student fees, restore education maintenance grants, end the discrimination in the minimum wage and increasing it to £10 an hour for everyone."

Labour stands ready to work with other parties to ensure a boundary review can go ahead in a way that benefits democracy – Cat Smith

Smith MP, Labour's Shadow Minister for Voter Engagement and Youth Affairs, commenting on reports in the Times that the Tories are to drop plans to reduce the number of seats in the Commons, said:

"Despite insisting that nothing has changed, it appears Theresa May has been forced to drop yet another manifesto commitment because she is too weak to command the support of her backbenchers.

"This proposal was always designed for the Tories' own political advantage rather than what is in the best interests of the country.

“Labour stands ready to work with other parties to ensure that a boundary review can go ahead in a way that benefits our democracy, not just the Conservative Party.”

There has still been no resolution on the issue of care workers receiving back pay for sleep-in shifts – Barbara Keeley

Barbara Keeley MP, Labour’s Shadow Cabinet Minister for Social Care, commenting on the issue of back pay for sleep-in shifts by care staff, said:

“There has still been no resolution on the issue of care workers receiving back pay for sleep-in shifts.

“The Tory Government’s lack of action is causing great uncertainty for our social care workforce. Tory Ministers need to ensure that care workers receive the money they have rightfully earned. Anything less would undermine the very principle of a statutory minimum wage and could encourage providers to plead poverty to get out of their duty to pay their care workforce properly.

“Good pay and conditions are essential to delivering good quality care for service users. This Tory Government needs to stop burying its head in the sand about the problems they have caused in social care and put the funding of social care on a long-term sustainable footing.”

As well as investing in our naval fleet, we must also invest in the men & women who serve in our Royal Navy –

Nia Griffith

Nia Griffith MP, Labour's Shadow

Defence Secretary, responding to the publication of the National Shipbuilding Strategy, said:

"I welcome the publication of the National Shipbuilding Strategy and the commitment to the long-term future for our shipbuilding industry. But as well as investing in our naval fleet, we must also invest in the men and women who serve in our Royal Navy.

"Despite warnings over many years, our Navy is facing a crisis in recruitment and retention. The Government is on course to miss its own target for the size of the Navy and we simply do not have enough sailors to crew our naval fleet.

"Experienced personnel are leaving the Navy because of dissatisfaction with pay and conditions. If the Government was serious about properly resourcing our Royal Navy it would lift the public sector pay cap and pay our servicemen and women properly."

The government must ensure their spending on childcare goes towards high quality early years education – Tracy Brabin

Tracy

Brabin MP, Labour's Shadow Early Years Minister,

commenting on the NAHT report on school readiness, said:

"This report should make sobering reading for Tory ministers. It is yet more evidence of a problem that has worsened on their watch. It is now incumbent on the government to ensure their spending on childcare goes towards high quality early years education, supporting children to get the best start in life.

"By contrast, the Tories' chronically underfunded 30-free hour childcare offer has not only left too many parents not receiving the free care they were promised but has seen many of the most experienced and highest-rated providers walk away from the sector entirely. Ministers should take their concerns seriously before the childcare sector reaches a crisis point.

“A

Labour government would provide genuinely free and high-quality childcare, with all parents of 2-4 year olds entitled to 30 hours, and the investment needed to deliver it in practice. We would also reverse the Tory cuts to Sure Start, which the evidence showed was a highly effective programme in supporting children to be school ready.”
