

National Security and Investment report shows new system is working

Press release

The first report on the UK's new national security and investment system has been published.

- Report shows operational success of new system for screening investments for national security concerns
- new system has been providing certainty for businesses, with all assessments completed within their legal deadlines
- businesses and investors encouraged to explore the guidance available to ensure they fulfil their legal obligations

The first report on the UK's new national security and investment system has been published by Business Secretary Kwasi Kwarteng today (Thursday 16 June). It covers the period from 4 January 2022, when the system came into place, to 31 March 2022.

The government's new powers under the National Security and Investment (NSI) Act provide it with the ability to intervene in qualifying acquisitions across the economy that could harm the UK's national security.

It also requires businesses and investors to notify the government of certain acquisitions across 17 sensitive areas of the economy.

The new system is providing businesses with clarity and speed, with all assessments completed within deadlines and many completed sooner.

Modern threats are being tackled, with deals involving cutting-edge technology such as artificial intelligence and the space sector being closely scrutinised. The conflict in Ukraine is an example of the instability that the government is guarding against.

Business Secretary Kwasi Kwarteng said:

The government is laser-focused on growing our economy and levelling up every part of the UK, but this will not come at the cost of our national security.

This report shows our new investment screening process is working. It's simple and quick, giving firms speed and certainty to do business in a way that protects the security of the UK.

The new system is more efficient as government has to call-in a deal for further assessment within 30 working days of accepting a notification, while under the previous system the government had had up to 4 months to intervene following the completion of a deal.

Key findings of the report include:

- the average time to inform parties that a notification has been accepted as complete is 3 working days. This is line with international partners, such as the USA's system taking 5 days
- where the government has called-in a deal, on average this has been decided in 24 working days. The shortest time the government took was 11 working days and all have been decided within the deadline of 30 days
- the government has received 222 deal notifications in the 3-month period
- of these deals, 17 were called-in by the government for further assessment
- of the 17 called-in, 3 were cleared with the other 14 cases still being assessed at the end of the reporting period

Acquisitions called-in for further assessment included businesses from areas of the economy such as artificial intelligence, advanced materials, and satellite and space technologies.

The government has published extensive guidance which includes the process for submitting notifications. The government encourages businesses to explore this platform to ensure they are fulfilling their legal obligations.

New pilots to boost support for rape victims in court

- enhanced specialist sexual violence support to be trialled at three major courts
- convictions up and support improved 1 year on from landmark Rape Review
- government pledges to go further with £460 million investment in support and Victims Bill

- government expands research into police handling of rape cases

All court staff, police and prosecutors working on cases will receive specialist trauma training, and expert at-court support, such as Independent Sexual Violence Advisors, will be available for victims.

Working closely with the police, CPS and judiciary, the government will use any learning from the pilots to complement ongoing efforts to tackle the backlog and increase the volume and speed of cases going through the system.

It follows a recommendation made by inspectors and the Justice Select Committee for specialist courts to be set up to deal with sexual violence cases. Leeds, Newcastle and Snaresbrook (London) Crown Courts have been chosen as they are currently dealing with a higher-than-average number of sex offence cases.

Courtrooms will also be equipped with new video technology and be able to take advantage of the rapid rollout of pre-recorded cross-examination for victims of rape. This spares victims, subject to a successful application to the court, the stress of giving evidence during a live trial and has already been introduced at 37 courts.

The initiative comes one year on since the government published its Rape Review Action Plan, with an update showing that considerable headway is being made in increasing convictions and improving support for victims.

Deputy Prime Minister, Lord Chancellor and Secretary of State for Justice, Dominic Raab said:

Rape convictions are up two thirds over the last year and cases are being completed 5 weeks quicker.

But we are restless to go further, and these pilots will focus on improving support for victims, tackling the backlog and reducing delays.

We're also rolling out pre-recorded evidence faster, recruiting 1000 sexual violence advisors, developing a 24/7 helpline and improving collaboration between police and prosecutors to ensure victims get the justice they deserve.

Alongside this, the government is continuing to roll out Operation Soteria, a new approach to investigating rape that focuses on the suspects not the victims. It involves academics working with police forces to examine their handling of rape cases and make recommendations for operational changes. It is already in action in five police force areas and will soon be rolled out to a further 14 forces by March 2023. By June 2023, these trials will lead to a new national operating model available to all police forces to better investigate and prosecute rape cases.

Home Secretary Priti Patel said:

Rape is an abhorrent crime and I want to see a transformation in the way these investigations are handled to make sure that all victims have the best support possible throughout the entire process.

By making police investigations less intrusive and putting victims at the forefront, we can improve the way in which the police handle these cases, so that the brave victims who come forward are not let down, and the criminals responsible are put behind bars.

Five police forces have also completed a pilot scheme where rape victims received replacement phones if they needed to be examined for longer than 24 hours. Work is ongoing to reduce intrusive requests for phones and for third party records such as therapy notes. The Attorney General's office has published new guidelines and a public consultation has been launched on police requests for third party materials today. This will look at understanding why the police request the information they do, as well as ensuring that all requests are necessary, proportionate, and timely.

Attorney General, the Rt. Hon. Suella Braverman QC MP, said:

The huge programme of joint working between the CPS and police shows some encouraging green shoots of improvement – the number of suspects charged by the CPS is increasing and the time it takes for the CPS to reach a charging decision is down, securing justice for more rape victims, faster. I've also updated my Disclosure Guidelines to further protect victims' privacy. We won't rest until public confidence in the criminal justice system is restored.

Over £460 million is being invested in victim support over the next three years, increasing the amount spent per year by 2025 by 92% compared to 2020/21. It will fund more than 1,000 Independent Sexual and Domestic Violence Advisors – a 43 percent increase over the next three years, a new 24/7 helpline for rape victims as well as hundreds of local support services nationwide.

Pre-recorded cross examination for rape victims is on course to be available nationwide by September and the number of specialist rape prosecutors has risen by 20 percent in the last year from 360 in April 2021 to 433 at the end of March 2022.

Meanwhile, the latest Criminal Justice System Delivery Data Dashboards are published today as part of a transparency drive. They include information on the time taken for cases to be investigated by the police, for someone to be charged, and for the case to be completed at court. The data can be broken down on a national or regional level, including by local police forces, CPS area as well as Local Criminal Justice Boards. The dashboard also includes information on victim engagement.

Emily Hunt, independent advisor to the government on the Rape Review, said:

Rape is a horrific crime that can have life-long, devastating impacts on its victims. I don't know that we can ever be doing enough, but right now, we are in an incredibly different place than we were a year ago. Charges are, finally, starting to go up.

But no one involved thinks where we are is good enough – because it is not even remotely good enough – and for me that is probably the most important part of where we are a year on: doing better, but still pushing further.

Fay Maxted OBE, Chief executive of the Survivors Trust, said:

The impact of rape and sexual abuse can have a lifelong impact on victims and survivors affecting all aspects of their lives and wellbeing. Sadly, we live in a society where rape myths and misunderstandings about trauma responses are common, often adding to the trauma that victims and survivors have already experienced. Survivors Trust has long advocated for court staff to receive trauma-informed training and we are pleased to see this measure being implemented as part of the new pilot scheme.

The provision of trauma-informed training and enhanced support for survivors in court is an encouraging step towards improving the court process for survivors of sexual violence and abuse. We look forward to the learnings from this pilot helping ensure similar measures are implemented across all crown courts in the future.

Director of Public Prosecutions Max Hill and National Police Chiefs' Council Lead for Rape and Adult Sexual Offences, Chief Constable Sarah Crew said:

Police and prosecutors are doing their part – working together – to make sure we improve the experience of those affected by these devastating crimes and support more rape victims to see justice. The effective investigation and prosecution of rape is one of the most important challenges facing the criminal justice system. We are optimistic that our actions through our Rape Strategy, Joint National Action Plan and Operation Soteria pathfinders are having an impact

The roll out of Soteria to 14 more police forces and three more CPS areas is welcome news as more parts of the country will continue to make improvements and learn lessons. Soteria offers an opportunity like no other to get to the bottom of the issues impacting successful investigations and prosecutions so we can get more positive outcomes. We are determined to make lasting change to this process and improve the victim experience at all points along the way.

Today's announcement builds on the publication of a draft Victims Bill which will amplify victims' voices and make justice agencies more accountable for the service they deliver.

Notes to editors

- The pilots will be operational by October and the 3 courts will continue to hear other cases outside of rape and sexual violence offences.
- An additional £6.6 million per year is being invested in victim support on top of the £440 million 3 year package announced in March. The Criminal Justice System statistics quarterly (published 19 May) showed rape convictions were up 67 percent compared to 2020 – 895 in 2021, 537 in 2020. It was a 27 percent increase compared to 2019 before the pandemic (702 in 2019).
- An online victim survey has also been launched today (16 June 2022) to find out directly from victims what support services they need. The feedback from this will help draw up the future of victim support. It can be accessed online on Thursday.
- The latest CJS Delivery Data Dashboard will be published at 09.30 on Thursday 16 June 2022.
- The first 5 forces participating in Operation Soteria are Avon and Somerset, Metropolitan, Durham, South Wales and West Midlands. The additional 14 forces taking part are: North Wales, Gwent, Dyfed-Powys, Northumbria, Gloucestershire, Devon and Cornwall, Warwickshire, Lancashire, Greater Manchester, Hampshire, Wiltshire, Dorset, Kent and Sussex. The key findings from the programme to date have been published in the Rape Review Progress Update today (16 June 2022).

Joint statement by UK MOD, US DOD, and German Defence Ministry

Press release

Joint Statement by the United States Department of Defense, the Ministry of Defence of the Federal Republic of Germany, and the Ministry of Defence of the United Kingdom.

The United States, United Kingdom, and Germany are deeply committed to supporting Ukraine as it defends itself against Russia's unprovoked invasion. Russia has shifted its focus to the Donbas region, where it is engaging in a systematic long-range rocket and artillery barrage against defensive Ukrainian military positions and civilian infrastructure alike.

To help Ukraine defend its citizens and sovereign territory, the United States, United Kingdom, and Germany have committed to provide Multiple Launch Rocket Systems (MLRS) with Guided MLRS (GMLRS) rockets. Ukraine has specifically requested this capability, which will allow the Ukrainian Armed Forces to engage the invading force with accurate fire at ranges of approximately 70 kilometers.

The United States announced on June 1, 2022 that it would provide four M142 High Mobility Artillery Rocket Systems (HIMARS) and GMLRS munitions. On June 6, the United Kingdom announced it would donate three M270 MLRS launchers with GMLRS munitions.

And today, at the Ukraine Defense Contact Group in Brussels, Belgium, Minister of Defense Christine Lambrecht announced that Germany would transfer three M270 Mittleres Artillerie Raketen System (MARS) launchers and GMLRS ammunition from Bundeswehr stocks.

The transfer of these MLRS systems, and the associated training our three countries will provide to Ukrainian operators is crucial to Ukraine's self-defense. The necessary training has already begun on the U.S. HIMARS and UK M270 systems for their deployment in the coming weeks, and training on the German MARS launchers will begin very soon so the systems and their Ukrainian crews can be deployed urgently and without delay.

Action to address the disproportionate suffering of women in conflict areas

Thank you, President for convening this debate.

I thank the expert briefers and regional organisations that we've heard so valuably from today.

In April, during our Presidency of the Council, Lord Ahmad of Wimbledon and Nadia Murad launched the Murad Code – a landmark code of conduct for gathering of information from survivors safely and effectively.

We have ensured that the code has been translated into Ukrainian so that it can be used, now, with the aim of holding perpetrators to account for their crimes.

The Secretary-General set out very clearly the many serious issues facing women in conflict areas all over the world, from Afghanistan to Ukraine to Myanmar. We do need action to address this if we are to prevent the disproportionate suffering of women in these crises and that's why we as the UK are particularly focused on the threat of sexual violence.

In November, the UK is hosting an international conference on Preventing Sexual Violence in Conflict in London, the centrepiece of a global campaign launched by Foreign Secretary Truss last year. For us, all options are on the table to strengthen international prevention and response to the heinous crimes of conflict-related sexual violence.

They remain one of the very horrifying consequences of Russia's illegal war in Ukraine.

Turning to the role of regional organisations, in many contexts as we have heard today, regional organisations have unique influence in advocating for the rights of women and girls, for example in the case of Afghanistan and the Organisation of Islamic Cooperation. We fully support all efforts as others have said to remove the fully counter-productive restrictions imposed on women and girls by the Taliban.

For our part, the UK supports and funds the regional Women Mediators across the Commonwealth network who are an experienced group of women who stand ready to support our collective efforts for peace at the community level. Members have resolved electoral conflicts in Uganda, mediated the political conflict in Myanmar, and bridged divided communities in Northern Ireland and Cyprus.

The UK also supports regional collaboration to drive change on the ground, for example through our work with ASEAN institutions and Member States on capacity-building.

We have also supported the development of NATO's first policies on sexual exploitation and abuse and on conflict-related sexual violence.

Looking forward, there are further practical actions regional organisations and Member States can take to support women's full, equal and meaningful participation, including:

First, ensuring women are at the heart and forefront of organisations, in leadership and decision-making roles, as others have said;

Second, actively promoting the agenda through communications and dialogue;

Third, developing regional action plans, tool kits and strategies on WPS, which are then fully implemented; and finally,

Sharing learning, experience and expertise among organisations to strengthen implementation of WPS, rather than duplicating efforts.

Thank you Madam President.
