The Prime Minister must abolish suspicion-less stop and search powers

The Black Lives Matter protests have demonstrated the urgent need to tackle racial injustice and address the pain and harm these injustices cause.

A Black person is 47 times more likely to be stopped and searched than a white person.

We are urging the Prime Minister to look again at some of the harmful policies his Government is pursuing. One of these is his expansion of Stop and Search powers.

Black people are disproportionately likely to be stopped and searched by the police, and for suspicion-less stop and search the figures are particularly stark.

Under suspicion-less Stop and Search powers, a Black person is 47 times more likely to be stopped and searched than a white person.

On too many occasions stop and search seems to mean being black is enough to suspect someone of being a criminal.

The Conservative Government is increasing the use of suspicion-less Stop and Search dramatically. Home Office figures show that the number of Section 60 searches has risen from 631 in 2016-17 to 13,175 in 2018-19 — a 20-fold increase in just two years.

On too many occasions stop and search seems to mean being black is enough to suspect someone of being a criminal.

Suspicion-less Stop and Search is also unnecessary. Without it, police would still have the power to stop and search people for weapons if they have reasonable suspicion. Stop and Search powers can be used fairly and effectively if they are focused on people who commit crime.

Boris Johnson must abolish suspicion-less Stop and Search powers and end the pain and injustice they wreak on so many people from Britain's black and minority communities.

On too many occasions, stop and search seems to mean 'being black is enough to be suspected of being a criminal'. — Acting Leader @EdwardJDavey

It is clear — we must move further and faster to redress institutional racism in the criminal justice system.

Starting a caring revolution

Coronavirus teaches many lessons. For me, one stands out: the importance of caring and carers — in care homes, supporting vulnerable people at home and millions of unpaid carers looking after loved ones.

A caring revolution isn't only the right campaign, it's smart politics too

People who've never appreciated how the NHS and care sector needed to work more closely together have seen that all too clearly, with the tragedy of COVID care home deaths.

As someone who's a carer now, after being a carer in my teenage years, the need for our society to value caring and carers properly has always been a personal driver.

My young carer experience began when I was 12. My Dad had died when I was four, so when Mum was diagnosed with terminal cancer, my brothers and I nursed her at home for three years.

From looking after her personal care needs to cooking her food, from administering morphine for her pain to talking with her for hours, we were left to it, albeit thankfully with the help of family and neighbours. Still today too many young carers bear the burden alone, isolating them and affecting their education and life chances.

Of course, people can end up with caring responsibilities at any age. Most unpaid carers are adult women, and people from our black and ethnic minority communities are disproportionately employed as carers on low incomes: issues of equality are firmly bound up with the caring revolution we need.

A caring revolution isn't only the right campaign, it's smart politics too. Carers UK estimate there were around 9 million carers in the UK pre-COVID, and that as many as 4 million more people have become carers during the pandemic.

We must champion a more caring society that rewards the role carers play and face up to caring's long term challenges

So I'm determined Liberal Democrats offer far more to this huge group. I'm starting today by introducing a new Bill in the Commons to secure more flexible employment rights for carers, alongside my five-point plan for carers:

- Employers would have to make reasonable adjustments for carers helping carers who wish to work to combine a job with caring
- Carers Allowance would be boosted immediately to £75 a week a 12% increase
- The amount carers can earn before losing out on Carers Allowance would rise from £128 a week to £160 a week
- Young carers would receive free travel on all public transport
- \bullet Carers would be made a protected characteristic in the Equality Act securing equal rights and protections for carers in the workplace and beyond

This would be only the start: we must build a caring society to stand the test of time.

My 12-year-old son John has an undiagnosed neurological condition, meaning he can't walk or talk properly. He needs care 24/7. As his condition isn't degenerative, he'll live far longer than my wife Emily or me. Our single greatest worry is how he will be cared for after we've gone. Huge numbers of parents live with similar anxieties.

As Liberal Democrats, we must champion a more caring society that rewards the role carers play and face up to caring's long term challenges.

The Government must commit to an inquiry into its handling of COVID-19

After failing to provide adequate PPE, testing and public health advice, it's no surprise that public trust in the Government is waning. People have made heartbreaking sacrifices. They deserve to know the truth. The Government must commit to a public inquiry to ensure it does not repeat the mistakes of the past.

The Government must not only be held to account, but step up and solve these crises as quickly as possible.

The fact remains that a comprehensive test, trace and isolate system is still the only way to keep people safe as we move out of lockdown.

Yet the Government still hasn't delivered on this, and apparently won't be able to until September. Ministers can't even provide figures for the number of people being tested day-to-day.

The Prime Minister needs to be utterly transparent about the barriers to opening schools, the limits to testing capacity and the issues affecting the test, trace and isolate system.

The British public deserve to know the truth.

As more and more questions are raised about key decisions throughout this crisis, Boris Johnson must now commit to an independent inquiry into his Government's handling of this pandemic. The British public deserve to know the truth.

Yesterday, Acting Leader Ed Davey asked the Prime Minister to confirm there would be a full independent inquiry into the Coronavirus so that we can learn from the mistakes that have been made, and ensure our communities are never thrown into a crisis like this ever again.

Whether it is the scandalous lack of PPE for frontline workers, the current failure to properly test, trace and isolate, or the true number of deaths, the Government must not only be held to account, but step up and solve these crises as quickly as possible.

As more and more questions are raised about key decisions throughout this crisis, Boris Johnson must now commit to an independent inquiry into his Government's handling of this pandemic. https://t.co/SEjHGu3Ytl

51 Years Since the Stonewall Riots

To this day, the Stonewall riots are widely considered to be one of the most important events leading to the gay liberation movement and the modern fight for LGBT+ rights.

On the morning of June 28 1969, police raided an underground gay bar in New York city called Stonewall Inn. The raid wasn't unusual but that morning the response was.

This time, as the police got violent, the people in the Stonewall Inn fought back.

Marsha P. Johnson, a black trans woman, threw the first brick. Stormé DeLarverie, a black lesbian woman, threw the first punch. And so began the Stonewall riots.
