- Scottish Conservative Council groups oppose SNP's Car Park Tax

21 Feb 2019

Every Scottish Conservative council leader in Scotland has today signed a pledge opposing the introduction of the SNP's new Workplace Parking Levy.

The 30 council leaders say in their joint statement that the new tax – which could cost commuters as much as £500 each – is a “tax on jobs” that would “unfairly penalise workers” who cannot use public transport to get to work.

SNP Ministers have admitted that no consultation has taken place over the tax – which has been widely criticised by unions, local firms, and opposition parties.

However, the new tax is likely to be nodded through to the next stage of legislation today when the SNP and Scottish Greens support the introduction of their Budget deal.

Scottish Conservative shadow finance secretary, Murdo Fraser said today:

“Right across Scotland, Scottish Conservatives are making it clear today that we oppose this unwanted, poorly thought-out tax.

“From Holyrood to local councils across Scotland, we will fight to stop it being introduced.

“Nicola Sturgeon has tried to argue that this won't impact people if their local council doesn't adopt it.

“Tell that to the tens of thousands of people from all over Scotland who commute into our cities and face having to pay up.

“it's now beholden on SNP councillors to follow suit, follow the lead of the Scottish Conservatives, and make clear that they too will oppose these ridiculous plans.

“That is the least they should do for their constituents.”

- Quarter of a million journeys across central Scotland set to be hit by Car Park Tax

19 Feb 2019

A car park tax introduced in Glasgow and Edinburgh would impact as many as a quarter of a million car journeys across the central Scotland region, according to official figures.

Analysis from Scotland's most recent census shows that 255,381 car and van work journeys are made into the two cities every day.

Of these, the majority – nearly 150,000 – begin outside the city boundaries, meaning that a tax imposed by Glasgow and Edinburgh city council would actually hit more people living outside those cities than in them.

Key areas affected include South Lanarkshire, North Lanarkshire, Renfrewshire, West Lothian, East Dunbartonshire and Midlothian.

People living there would have no say on the imposition of a car park tax set by Glasgow or Edinburgh but would still be in line to pay it if they commuted to either of those cities.

Murdo Fraser, Scottish Conservative shadow finance secretary said:

“Nicola Sturgeon claimed over the weekend that people who didn't live in areas where this tax is to be imposed wouldn't be affected. How out of touch can she be?

“These shocking figures show that even if only Glasgow and Edinburgh decide to go ahead and impose this levy, hundreds of thousands of commuters from those cities, and many other parts of Scotland, could be hit by the SNP's car park tax.

“That's thousands of people doing the right thing, going to work, and being punished by the SNP for the effort.

“When public transport is so bad, leaving with no option but to take the car, it is a total disgrace.

“This week, the SNP is bringing its Budget back to Parliament. There's been no consultation and no thought put into this absurd tax. For everybody's sakes, Nicola Sturgeon should listen for once and bin it now."

The figures above are found in a 2014 analysis of travel to work flows between Local Authority areas in Scotland, conducted by Edinburgh City Council. The link is here, with figures for car and van work journeys on page 44

SNP's broken promise on income tax

18 Feb 2019

The Scottish Conservatives will today (Tuesday) highlight the SNP's broken promise on income tax during the Holyrood debate on the Rates Resolution.

The Scottish Government has set out the increased Scottish income tax rates and bands, which will further widen the tax gap between Scotland and the rest of the United Kingdom.

Murdo Fraser, Scottish Conservative shadow finance secretary will point out that the SNP government was elected on a manifesto not to increase the basic rate of income tax.

The Scottish Conservatives will vote against this increase, thereby keeping their own manifesto promise.

Murdo Fraser, Scottish Conservative shadow finance secretary will say:

“Today’s Rates Resolution is another broken promise to the Scottish people.

“This is an SNP government elected on a manifesto not to increase income tax rates, and it has again broken that promise.

“In 2016 almost two-thirds of Scots, 64.6%, voted for parties that promised not to raise taxes in the Scottish Parliament’s election, either the SNP or the Scottish Conservatives.

“Today the SNP have let these people down again.

“We will say to the Scottish people, there is at least one party that is on your side, one party that does not want to see the income tax gap between Scotland and the rest of the UK growing, one party which will oppose the unfair car park tax, and that is the Scottish Conservatives.

“We will oppose the Rates Resolution today which can only damage the Scottish economy and our hard-working families.”

Health boards shortchanged by SNP budget

18 Feb 2019

Health boards in Scotland have been shortchanged by tens of millions of pounds as a result of SNP budget decisions, it has emerged.

In finance secretary Derek Mackay’s budget, he increased the overall health spend by 5.3 per cent, according to the Scottish Parliament’s Information Service (SPICe).

However, territorial health boards – who are in charge of delivering the vast majority of NHS care – received just a 3.8 per cent uplift.

The changes saw health board budgets for 2019/20 rise from £9.452 billion to £9.811 billion.

But if the 5.3 per cent figure had been applied, they would have got £9.953 billion – a difference of £142 million.

In previous years, overall health budget increases have been passed on entirely to health boards.

Shadow health secretary Miles Briggs said that gulf could help fund thousands of nurses and better equip health boards at a time of increasing challenges.

SPICe said the overwhelming reason for the disparity was a transfer of £120 million from the health budgets to local government.

Thanks to the UK Conservative Government's decision to invest an extra £20 billion in the NHS, an additional £2 billion will be available to invest in Scotland's health service – the largest cash injection in its history.

Scottish Conservative shadow health secretary Miles Briggs said:

“Health boards are the ones on the front line, and responsible for delivering the vast majority of NHS work.

“It's therefore crucial that, when the overall health budget increases, that is passed on to the territorial health boards too.

“Instead, the SNP is short-changing them to the tune of tens of millions of pounds. That could pay for nurses, midwives, GPs and go some way to addressing the chaotic situation on many of our hospital wards.

“There's no-one to blame but the SNP for this – the party has been in sole charge of health for almost 12 years now.

“What's more, the nationalists have even more money to spend on health thanks to increased health spending in the UK, which then comes to Scotland via Barnett Consequentials.”

- Senior Labour MP's reported comments show party has 'given up on Scotland'

17 Feb 2019

Labour have “given up on Scotland” in their attempts to get Jeremy Corbyn into Number 10, it was claimed today.

Following a crushing poll which shows the party's Scottish MPs would be almost wiped out by a General Election, a senior Labour politician reportedly suggested this would be a price worth paying for a Corbyn government.

Shadow Scottish Secretary Lesley Laird is said to have been comfortable with the prospect of a minority UK Government "propped up by the SNP".

The comments, relayed to the Sunday Times by a Labour MP, were made at a weekly meeting of MPs.

Scottish Conservative chief whip Maurice Golden described the Sunday newspaper comments as evidence of "capitulation" to the Nationalists.

He said:

"These comments show that Labour have given up on Scotland.

"What's more, they're ready to surrender everything to the SNP.

"It's been suspected for some time that Jeremy Corbyn and Nicola Sturgeon are plotting a power grab in Westminster.

"Labour's capitulation just confirms there is only one party who will stand up for the Scottish people in Westminster and Holyrood – the Scottish Conservatives."

The YouGov poll showed Scottish Labour would lose five of its seven Westminster seats, were a General Election to be held now.

The Scottish Labour MP had commented:

"Colleagues were angry that the hard-won seats at last year's elections seemed unimportant to her.

"We should be winning seats at Westminster, not losing.

"If there were to be a minority Labour government with only a few seats in Scotland, we could end up at the mercy of a Labour government propped by the SNP.

"That's all we need."
